Schizophrenia is a debilitating disorder affecting millions of individuals worldwide. Cognitive impairment in schizophrenia is a core feature and a central criterion for diagnosis. This study used a network analysis approach to the largest available data set of neuropsychological test data from subjects with schizophrenia, in an attempt to identify neurocognitive domains that show cross-domain connectivity patterns consistent with impairment. A total of 15,319 neuropsychological test data points collected from 2513 subjects were analyzed. A network-based clustering of neuropsychological tests was performed using the k-means clustering algorithm, allowing for the identification of 40 different neurocognitive domains. Cross-domain connectivity (CSC) was used to detect patterns of impairment in specific domains. Further, to determine the number of distinct neurocognitive domains underlying schizophrenia, an ICLUST clustering algorithm was used to determine the optimal number of neurocognitive domains that best fit the data. Each subject was represented in the network by a vector of neuropsychological test data. The data set was analyzed using the Kruskal-Wallis Rank Sum test. Clustering of the neuropsychological test data resulted in three neurocognitive domains characterized by significantly impaired performance on tasks assessing processing speed, working memory, and problem solving and 2edc1e01e8
